In addition to the troublemaking incidents of the 1970s, the US and Pakistan have long-simmering disagreements over the militants in the country. But any hopes that the world's most powerful military is prepared to act decisively are likely to be dashed. A military agreement between Washington and Islamabad has managed to hold on for more than 10 years, but even then, the deal didn't last. And that's just for starters. Secret meetings, blunt messages, and more The decades-long engagement between the US and Pakistan have been complicated, to say the least. But at the center of it all are a handful of advisors from Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency — the country's military-intelligence agency — and their American counterparts in the CIA. It's all been a little bit high-pressure — with a long list of Pakistani officials complaining to their American handlers about the behavior of the insurgents. But there have also been lengthy meetings with very specific goals, secret messages back and forth, and maybe even a couple of fingers crossed. In exchange for that behavior, Pakistan has gotten most of the support that it's needed to keep its economy afloat, to convince the growing number of Pakistanis that the military should continue to lead their country. The US has dangled the carrot of $1 billion in aid, trade incentives, and technical assistance, including on drone strikes. But even with this funding, the Taliban and other militants continue to battle the Pakistani military in the northwest, especially against the Taliban stronghold in the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA). Even more importantly, the US has given Islamabad a free hand to arrest and prosecute Taliban 0cc13bf012
