I'm an undergraduate student, and I do a lot of public presentations about my own work and courses. When people in the audience can't see my presentations, do they tell my classmates/professors/parents/friends about it? A: No, that would be disrespectful and out of line. Whether you are giving a presentation to a student audience or someone else, it is your work you are presenting, and you have a right to be in control of your work. Now, if someone is in the audience and wants to see your slides after you have finished your presentation, and you want to allow that, then it is a different issue. You may want to be professional and offer to meet afterwards to discuss the presentation, but it is really up to you, and how you present yourself. A: Definitely yes. I just presented a seminar as my master's thesis, so in my case, I had a unique situation. I would usually ask a student to help me make sure I had everything that I wanted to show and then I would announce that I had to leave because I had the whole department at a dinner and I wanted to have an excuse for them to leave early. A: Lately, a lot of my presentations are not public, so I have no way of knowing whether people talk about it or not. However, I have heard from professors that do enjoy explaining slides publicly when they only just saw what the student showed. To be honest, I can't see myself doing that at all. There is a story, maybe not the same you would read, of a student who would give a presentation in
