It should take, as a parameter, an array of chars. It should be optimized for speed, so I can't use strcat(arrayOfChars, "something"). I could probably use memcpy and strcat, but I was hoping for a way that would be more elegant and efficient (since strcat requires, I think, heap allocations, which is expensive for my application). A: You may use memcpy() and strcpy() or strncpy(). The difference is that strcpy() appends to the destination whereas strncpy() copies at most n bytes. A: This is an interesting question, and can't be answered without knowing what you expect to be the benefit of doing it another way. I would think doing it the slower way would not be a problem unless you are concatenating a really long string. A: I'm looking at the MSDN documentation, and it says: The strcpy_s function copies the specified destination string and appends the terminating null character. It can be called with either s or sz as the destination string.
